I'm not robot	reCAPTCHA
Continue

Adverb clause of reason exercises pdf

TYRE ANSWERS (Your answers will be displayed in a new window) Return to clauses exercise list in contrast although or events though. Althoug/Even though we had a bad game, we won. We won, although/even if we had a bad game. however to link two different phrases. We normally use however at the beginning of the second sentence after a full stop (.) or a semi-colon (;). However it is still followed by a comma. We didn't like the hotel. However, we had a fantastic time. We went to the beach; however, the time was not perfect. We can also use however at the end of the sentence. We didn't like the hotel. We had a fantastic time, however, notwithstanding / in spite of and in spite of them normally followed by a noun or a -verb. They can go to the beginning or middle of the sentence. Despite/despite the rain, we went to the concert. They arrived despite / in spite of the fact that. We came out despite / in spite of the fact that it was raining. Classes of the Goal + Infinite the most common way to express the English reason is in + infinite. The student has worked hard to pass the exam. In order to or so as + infinite ly are more common in formal English, mostly in writing. Negative shapes are in their own order and so as not + infinite. We are being asked to stay in order to finish the project. He left home early so it wasn't overdue. Use a plastic hammer so like to avoid damage. They walked quietly so that they wouldn't wake up to the children. So that + clause We can also use that + subject + verb express purpose. We normally use a modal verb and this connects, as could, would, etc. We left early to pack up near the mall. He did some flashcards so that it would be easier for his henry to remember the instructions. For + Noun We Can Also Use + Noun to Express Purposes. We went to the bar for a drink. Would you like to go to the park for a run? We can use for + -ing verbs (instead of + infinite) to talk about the object or action when we want it. This knife (used) for plastic cutting. Schools for education, not to entertain. in case + clauses For Express purpose, we can also use in case + subject + verbs. We use this form to talk about caution, when we do something because something was not meant to happen. Take the umbrella so that you won't get wet if it rains) I'm not going to say let's in case he tells everyone else. The reason when we want to explain the reason why something happened or why someone did something, we use a reason that we are presented by a congestion (such as, since, because) or a noun sentence presented due, due, due, due, due, or on account. because we use because before a clause (subject + verb). It can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence (at the end is most common). A comma is used when the clause of purpose is at the beginning of the sentence. We didn't go because it was heavy raining. Because the event was canceled, the deposits were lost, as/since we are used as and since in a very similar way due. They are followed by topic + verbs and can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence. However, as and more common in writing than English. The government asked people to stay inside/ as more rain forecast for the entire weekend. As/Since roads were blocked, victims had to be rescued by helicopter. due to our use due to / owing to / on the account We can also use due to / owing to / on account of before one noun. They mean 'because of' but they are more formal. The event was canceled due to/owing to/on account of lack of interest. I couldn't enjoy the meal due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. Result classes We use paragraphs of results to talk about the results of an action or situation. Page 2 clauses in contrast although, though we can be used although/even if at the beginning or middle of a sentence followed by a clause (subject + verb). We never use a comma after although we had a bad game, we won. We won, although/even if we had a bad game, however we use however to link two different phrases. We normally use however at the beginning of the second sentence after a full stop (.) or a semi-colon (;). However at the hotel. However, we had a fantastic time. We went to the beach; however, the time was not perfect. We can also use however at the end of the sentence. We didn't like the hotel. We had a fantastic time, however. notwithstanding / in spite of and in spite of them normally followed by a noun or a -verb. They can go to the beginning or middle of the sentence. Despite/despite the rain, we went to the concert. They arrived despite / in spite of quitting very early. We can use a clause (subject + verb) after notwithstanding / in spite of + the fact that it was raining. Classes of the Goal + Infinite the most common way to express the English reason is in + infinite. The student has worked hard to pass the exam. In order to / so as + infinite In order to or so as + infinitely are more common in formal English, mostly in writing. Negative shapes are in their own order and so as not + infinite. We are being asked to stay in order to finish the project. He left home early so it wasn't overdue. Use a plastic hammer so like to avoid damage. They walked guietly so that they wouldn't wake up to the children. so that + We can also use that + topic + verb express purpose. We normally use a modal verb and this connects, as could, would, etc. We left early to pack up near the mall. He did some flashcards so that it would be easier for his henry to remember the instructions. For + Noun We Can Also Use + Noun to Express Purposes. We went to the bar for a run? We can use for + -ing verbs (instead of + infinite) to talk about the object of an object or action when we use the verb used or when we want it. This knife (used) for plastic cutting. Schools for education, not to entertain, in case + clauses For Express purpose, we can also use in case + subject + verbs. We use this form to talk about caution, when we do something because something was not meant to happen. Take the umbrella in case it's raining. (= take the umbrella so that you won't get wet if it rains) I'm not going to say let's in case he tells everyone else. The reason why something happened or why someone did something, we use a reason presented by a conjonction (as, since, because) or a noun sentence presented by because, due to, due to, owwing, or on account of. because we use because before a clause (subject + verb). It can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence (at the end is most common). A comma is used when the clause of purpose is at the beginning of the sentence. We didn't go because it was heavy raining. Because the event was canceled, the deposits were lost, as/since we are used as and since in a very similar way due. They are followed by topic + verbs and can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence. However, as and since they have more formal expressions, and more common in writing than English. The government asked people to stay inside/ as more rain forecast for the entire weekend. As/Since roads were blocked, victims had to be rescued by helicopter. due to our use due to a noun. The concert was flagged because of heavy rain. Due to / owing to / on the account We can also use due to / owing to / on account of before one noun. They mean 'because of' but they are more formal. The event was canceled due to/owing to/on account of lack of interest. I couldn't enjoy the meal due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. Result classes We use paragraphs of results to talk about the results of an action or situation. Page 3 clauses in contrast although we can be used although or middle of a sentence followed by a clause (subject + verb). We never use a comma after although or events though. Althoug/Even though we had a bad game, we won. We won, although/even if we had a bad game, however to link two different phrases. We normally use however at the beginning of the second sentence after a full stop (.) or a semi-colon (;). However this is followed by a comma. We didn't like the hotel. However, we had a fantastic time. We went to the beach; however, the time was not perfect. We can also use however at the end of the sentence. We didn't like the hotel. We had a fantastic time, however, notwithstanding / in spite of and in spite of them normally followed by a noun or a -verb. They can go to the beginning or middle of the sentence. Despite/despite the rain, we went to the concert. They arrived despite / in spite of quitting very early. We can use a clause (subject + verb) after notwithstanding / in spite of + the fact that. We came out despite / in spite of the fact that it was raining. Classes of the Goal + Infinite the most common way to express the English reason is in + infinite. The student has worked hard to pass the exam. In order to / so as + infinite ln order to or so as + infinitely are more common in formal English, mostly in writing. Negative shapes are in their own order and so as not + infinite. We are being asked to stay in order to finish the project. He left home early so it wasn't overdue. Use a plastic hammer so like to avoid damage. They walked quietly so that they wouldn't wake up to the children. So that + clause We can also use that + subject + verb express purpose. We normally use a modal verb and this connects, as could, would, etc. We left early to pack up near the mall. He did some flashcards so that it would be easier for his henry to remember the instructions. For + Noun We Can Also Use + Noun to Express Purposes. We went to the bar for a drink. Would you like to go to the park for a run? We can use for + -ing verbs (instead of + infinite) to talk about the object or action when we use the verb used or when we want it. This knife (used) for plastic cutting. Schools for education, not to entertain. in case + clauses For Express purpose, we can also use in case + subject + verbs. We use this form to talk about caution, when we do something because something was not meant to happen. Take the umbrella in case it's raining. (= take the umbrella so that you won't get wet if it rains) I'm not going to say let's in case he tells everyone else. The reason when we want to explain the reason why something happened or why someone did something, we use a reason presented by because, due to, due to, owwing, or on account of. because we use because before a clause (subject + verb). It can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence (at the end is most common). A comma is used when the clause of purpose is at the beginning of the sentence. We didn't go because it was heavy raining. Because the event was canceled, the deposits were lost, as/since we are used as and since in a very similar way due. They are followed by topic + verbs and can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence. However, similar to since they are more formal and more common in writing than English. The government asked people to stay inside/ as more rain forecast for the entire weekend. As/Since roads were blocked, victims had to be rescued by helicopter, due to our use due to a noun. The concert was flagged because of heavy rain. Due to / owing to / on the account We can also use due to / owing to / on account of before one noun. They mean 'because of' but they are more formal. The event was canceled due to/owing to/on account of lack of interest. I couldn't enjoy the meal due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. Result due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. Result due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. order so as so that therefore clauses in contrast although, though we can be used although/even if at the beginning or middle of a sentence followed by a clause (subject + verb). We never use a comma after although or events though. Although we had a bad game, we won. We won, although/even if we had a bad game. however we use however to link two different phrases. We normally use however at the beginning of the second sentence after a full stop (.) or a semi-colon (;). However it is still followed by a comma. We didn't like the hotel. However, we had a fantastic time. We went to the beach; however, the time was not perfect. We can also use however at the end of the sentence. We didn't like the hotel. We had a fantastic time, however. notwithstanding / in spite of them normally followed by a noun or a -verb. They can go to the beginning or middle of the sentence. Despite/despite the rain, we went to the concert. They arrived despite / in spite of quitting very early. We can use a clause (subject + verb) after notwithstanding / in spite of + the fact that. We came out despite / in spite of the fact that it was raining. Classes of the Goal + Infinite the most common way to express the English reason is in + infinite. The student has worked hard to pass the exam. In order to / so as + infinite In order to or so as + infinite In order to or so as + infinite. We are being asked to stay in order to finish the project. He left home early so it wasn't overdue. Use a plastic hammer so like to avoid damage. They walked guietly so that + clause We can also use that + subject + verb express purpose. We normally use a modal verb and this connects, as could, would, etc. We left early to pack up near the mall. He did some flashcards so that it would be easier for his henry to remember the instructions. For + Noun to Express Purposes. We went to the bar for a drink. Would you like to go to the park for a run? We can use for + -ing verbs (instead of + infinite) to talk about an object or action when we use the verb used or when we mean it. This knife (used) for plastic cutting. Schools for education, not to entertain. in case + clauses For Express purpose, we can also use in case + subject + verbs. We use this form to talk about caution, when we do something because something was not meant to happen. Take the umbrella in case it's raining. (= take the umbrella so that you won't get wet if it rains) I'm not going to say let's in case he tells everyone else. The reason when we want to explain the reason why something happened or why someone did something, we use a reason presented by a conjonction (as, since, because) or a noun sentence presented by because before a clause (subject + verb). It can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence (at the end is most common). A comma is used when the clause of purpose is at the beginning of the sentence. We didn't go because it was heavy raining. Because the event was canceled, the deposits were lost, as/since we are used as and since in a very similar way due. They are followed by topic + verbs and can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence. However, as and since they have more formal expressions, and more common in writing than English. The government asked people to stay inside/ as more rain forecast for the entire weekend. As/Since roads were blocked, victims had to be rescued by helicopter. due to our use due to a noun. The concert was flagged because of heavy rain. Due to / owing to / on account of before one noun. They mean 'because of' but they are more formal. The event was canceled due to/owing to/on account of lack of interest. I couldn't enjoy the meal due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. Result classes We use paragraphs of results to talk about the results to talk about the results to talk about the results of an action or situation. Page 5 clauses in contrast although, though we can be used although/even if at the beginning or middle of a sentence followed by a clause (subject + verb). We never use a comma after although or events though or events though we had a bad game, however we use however to link two different phrases. We normally use however at the beginning of the second sentence after a full stop (.) or a semi-colon (;). However it is still followed by a comma. We didn't like the hotel. We had a fantastic time. We went to the beach; however, the time was not perfect. We can also use however at the end of the sentence. We didn't like the hotel. We had a fantastic time, however. notwithstanding / in spite of and in spite of them normally followed by a noun or a -verb. They can go to the beginning or middle of the sentence. Despite/despite the rain, we went to the concert. They arrived despite/despite very early. We can use a clause (subject + verb) after notwithstanding / in spite of + the fact that. We came out despite / in spite of the fact that it was raining. Classes of the Goal + Infinite the most common way to express the English reason is in + infinite. The student has worked hard to pass the exam. In order to / so as + infinite In order to or so as + infinitely are more common in formal English, mostly in writing. Negative shapes are in their own order to finish the project. He left home early so it wasn't overdue. Use a plastic hammer so like to avoid damage. They walked guietly so that they wouldn't wake up to the children. So that + clause We can also use that + subject + verb express purpose. We normally use a modal verb and this connects, as could, would, etc. We left early to pack up near the mall. He did some flashcards so that it would be easier for his henry to remember the instructions. For + Noun We Can Also Use + Noun to Express Purposes. We went to the bar for a drink. Would you like to go to the park for a run? We can use for + -ing verbs (instead of + infinite) to talk about the object of an object or action when we use the verb used or when we want it. This knife (used) for plastic cutting. Schools for education, not to entertain. in case + clauses For Express purpose, we can also use in case + subject + verbs. We use this form to talk about caution, when we do something because something was not meant to happen. Take the umbrella in case it's raining. (= take the umbrella so that you won't get wet if it rains) I'm not going to say let's in case he tells everyone else. The reason why someone did something, we use a reason presented by a conjonction (as, since, because) or a noun sentence presented by because, due to, due to, due to, due to, owwing, or on account of. because we use because before a clause (subject + verb). It can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence (at the end is most common). A comma is used when the clause of purpose is at the beginning of the sentence. We didn't go because it was heavy raining. Because the event was canceled, the deposits were lost, as/since we are used as and since in a very similar way due. They are followed by topic + verbs and can be used at the beginning or end of a sentence. However, as and since they have more formal expressions, and more common in writing than English. The government asked people to stay inside/ as more rain forecast for the entire weekend. As/Since roads were blocked, victims had to be rescued by helicopter. due to our use due to a noun. The concert was flagged because of heavy rain. Due to / owing to / on the account We can also use due to / owing to / on account of before one noun. They mean 'because of' but they are more formal. The canceled event due to to/on account of lack of interest. I couldn't enjoy the meal due to/owing to/on the third constant chatting account. Result classes We use paragraphs of results to talk about the results of an action or situation. Situation.